The one issue that may prove to be major for a novice is the color fidelity. That's because the software is quite different from the previous version in terms of color processing and Sharpening algorithms. Naturally, this should be a welcome improvement. It is good for users of Adobe Camera Raw and i1Photo who desperately needed deep features in their apps. I praise the move, but I am not sure if it is a good fit for day-to-day editing functions. Hardcore users may welcome it, and I am sure that they wouldn't speak against it. For those of you who have Lightroom 4 Lightroom 5, it is a proven fact that the newer version is 10% faster and 30% more responsive than its predecessor. Adobe claims that Lightroom 5 now natively supports 64-bit processing, and in this regard, their claims seem to be reasonable. But aside this, there are some minor improvements that most potential Lightroom 5 buyers should appreciate. First, the app now features the newer Lightroom's share import functionality, which can be used to share your edits with others via social networks like Facebook and Twitter. As a result, if you use Lightroom 5 for a while, you will recapture many of those lost features that most likely took you at least half an hour to discover and implement. You can now automatically tag your images based on the type of image they are. More importantly, whether you have all your photos setup in your Import folders or in other folders, you will now see those photos in the new Library View, which supports metadata tagging. Last but not least, the number of supported location options has been brought up by two to 10, whenever there are more than 10 locations on a device. That's a definite step forward and it will save you time in the future.
